

Soldiers are the stars of new documentary

The Patriot Ledger

In the 13 years since the United States has fought in Afghanistan, the public has rarely, if at all, seen flag draped coffins on a transport plane or weeping soldiers. Most people have never heard the shouts of soldiers facing fire, their urgent calls for a Medevac plane, their curses when the attacked plane can't land, and their declaration to rescue a critically wounded comrade.

Lawmakers push to extend 9/11 health and benefits programs for 25 years

WNYC-FM

New York lawmakers gathered in the shadow of the World Trade Center site to call for Congress to reauthorize the James Zadroga 9/11 Health and Compensation Act. The current bill provides medical treatment and compensation through the World Trade Center Program and September 11th Victim Compensation Fund to first responders and others who became ill from Ground Zero. The programs have paid out more than $1.1 billion dollars to those affected by the attacks, but the programs are set to start expiring in October 2015

Foundation sends kin of 9/11 victims to college

The New York Times

Of the 3,051 children who lost a parent in the Sept. 11 attacks, about 300 were kindergartners that day. Many of them are now taking their first classes in college, and about 100 of them, including Mr. Booker, will begin their higher education with full scholarships from the Families of Freedom Scholarship Fund, which was formed a week after the attacks to benefit children of the victims.

A former firefighter, Steve Buscemi produces new HBO documentary on FDNY

The Wall Street Journal

Before becoming an actor, Steve Buscemi worked for the Fire Department of New York for four years in the 1980s. Then 13 years ago, firefighters clearing debris at Ground Zero spotted someone among them who looked a lot like "the guy from 'Con Air.'" Now he has been working on the HBO documentary "A Good Job: Stories of the FDNY," which aired Sept. 8.

Losing a friend on 9/11 inspired me to bike around the world

Yahoo Travel

Daivd Sylvester writes: "I was inspired to get out and connect with people after my friend Kevin died in the terrorist attacks of 9/11. I have since biked across Asia and Africa, and I've crossed North America three times by bike. I plan to bike across Australia this fall."
